Katherine and Jay Wolf were college sweethearts. After marrying at the age of 22, these Southerners moved to California.

The young couple lived an idyllic life by the beach in Malibu. He studied law at Pepperdine; she began modeling and acting. They had a baby boy.

On April 21, 2008, the unthinkable happened. While their son napped peacefully in his crib, Katherine collapsed on the kitchen floor while making lunch. Jay arrived home and found his young wife in distress. He called 911. She was rushed to UCLA Medical Center where doctors discovered she had massive bleeding in her brain caused by a congenital brain defect – an arteriovenous malformation (AVM).

Her doctors performed 16 hours of intricate brain surgery to save her life. They removed 60% of her cerebellum. Thankfully, Katherine's cognition and mental faculties were still intact. Yet her motor control was completely gone and the right side of her face was paralyzed.

She spent 40 days in intensive care at UCLA, then another three months in its neuro-acute rehab unit before she was transferred to Casa Colina's Transitional Living Center for its intensive rehabilitation program. Jay moved into one of the Casa Colina homes adjacent to the campus with their son, so he could be there to attend her therapy sessions and support her.

The Tribute to Courage will present the inspirational story of how they moved on with their lives.

🌿 About Casa Colina 🌿

Casa Colina Centers for Rehabilitation provides care to more than 10,500 children and adults each year through medically supervised inpatient and outpatient physical rehabilitation programs and community services. Its commitment to clinical excellence, education and research, along with its unmatched continuum of rehabilitative care, has earned it national and worldwide acclaim.

Operating as one of our nation's few remaining not-for-profit independent freestanding rehabilitation hospitals, Casa Colina is located in eastern Los Angeles County and has served Southern California and beyond for nearly 75 years. It remains committed to providing care to individuals in need of medical and rehabilitation services, regardless of their ability to pay. Your support of this fundraising event allows Casa Colina to fulfill that commitment and is sincerely appreciated.
